SOUTHEASTERN CLIMBERS COALITION CELEBRATES 20 YEARS 11
MEET THE ACCESS FUND STAFF 12

“Our public lands, beloved climbing areas, and yes even our democracy are treasures worth fighting for.”

— Brady Robinson

Though our government can be incredibly frustrating, it is important to stay engaged.

Between the flooding in Colorado and the budget impasse in Congress, pretty much every single climbing area in the Boulder area is closed as I write this. The First Flatiron opened up a few days ago; that’s about what we’ve got for now. Rocky Mountain National Park is closed. Eldorado Canyon is closed. You can’t even drive up Boulder Canyon. And Yosemite and all the other National Parks in the nation are closed. A few people pointed out that our intentionally over-the-top video ad in Reel Rock last year depicting El Cap closing down really came to pass. We didn’t expect that to actually happen.

This is not a permanent state of affairs – by the time you read this, many if not all of these areas will likely be open again. But it does go to show that what once seemed nearly immutable – roads, bridges, cliffs, and access trails – can be taken away, either through natural disaster or tragic political comedy.

The morale of the story? We shouldn’t take anything for granted. I once heard someone say, “What are you going to do when all the climbing areas are open and safe?” Yeah, right. And though our government can be incredibly frustrating, it is important to stay engaged, even if we begin to lose faith in our leaders. Our public lands, beloved climbing areas and yes, even our democracy, are treasures worth fighting for.

That’s what we’ve been trying to do, more or less, at the Access Fund for nearly 23 years now. In this issue of the Vertical Times we celebrate our one millionth grant dollar, congratulate the Southeastern Climber’s Coalition on 20 years of successful work, and welcome three brand new local climbing organizations into our network.

Have a great holiday! Check out our holiday packs – they always sell out and make great gifts. And let’s all hope for less dysfunction in our government in 2014.

See you out there,

Action Center Never Works!

When you send Action Alerts, there is nothing there when I click the link. I've tried multiple times.

— RENEE, CA

AF: Sorry about that, Renee. Our Action Center does not play nice with the Firefox browser when it's running the Adblock Plus add-on. Nine times out of ten, that is the issue when people don't see content in the Action Center. You can either use a different browser or temporarily disable Adblock Plus and it should work just fine. Sorry for the inconvenience.

Jeep Discount

I just saved $2,500 on a new Jeep Wrangler using my Access Fund discount. That is so rad!

— KEVIN, CO

AF: Kevin, so glad you were able to take advantage of the Chrysler Preferred Pricing deal for Access Fund members. Members in good standing are eligible for this special discount as part of Jeep brand's sponsorship of the Access Fund–Jeep Conservation Team. www.accessfund.org/AffiliateRewards

What's the Deal with Joint Membership?

I've heard you guys are now offering joint membership with local climbing access groups. How do I find out if my local group is participating?

— REBECCA, TN

AF: Rebecca, you can find a list of participating local climbing organizations (LCOs) at www.accessfund.org/jointmembership, along with links to join or renew as a joint member. If you don't see your organization on the list, talk to the leaders of your local group about participating!

Local Climbing Organization 101:
How to Secure a Recreational Lease

Your local privately owned crag has been closed for years now, but the landowner has finally come around to consider a recreational lease for climbing access. Fortunately, Access Fund has some resources and tips to assist local climbing organizations with this process:

Insurance: Most landowners require insurance for additional liability protection. Purchasing a single policy can cost thousands, but Access Fund has a program to provide the local climbing organization and landowner with additional named insured coverage through our policy if Access Fund is listed as a co-signer on the lease. Certain limitations and requirements apply, such as no commercial use.

Lease Payments: The landowner may consider no annual payment. But when it's required, consider the LCO's fundraising capacity for the climbing area—$1,000 may be reasonable to fundraise on a yearly basis.

Lease Term: Long terms such as five years or more are generally preferred so the lease does not need to be renegotiated annually. Provide a provision for automatic renewal, but also provide for termination if necessary.

Stewardship Support: Include terms for an annual Adopt a Crag and periodic maintenance like litter removal—this will help show the landowner that climbers are good stewards.

Parking & Access: This may be the trickiest part, depending on the climbing area. Many landowners who live onsite are concerned about privacy and high traffic. Consider opening access only on certain days of the week to accommodate the landowner. Make sure expectations are reasonable, because volunteers can't be available to enforce rules 24/7.

Legal Review: Access Fund can help draft a lease agreement and spell out additional language, but separate legal review by a qualified attorney is always suggested.

Devastating Floods in Boulder, CO

Historic flooding along Colorado's Front Range closed Eldorado Canyon, Boulder Canyon, and Rocky Mountain National Park this past September, as well as many of the roads to these areas. The majority of Boulder Canyon and Rocky Mountain National Park have been reopened; however, there is still extensive damage to Eldorado Canyon, which remains closed. Boulder Climbing Community, Action Committee for Eldorado, and Flatirons Climbing Council have teamed up with other local nonprofits to rebuild access trails. Visit <http://boulderclimbingcommunity.net> for information on ways to donate and get involved.

New Local Group to Steward Wyoming's Bighorn Basin, Including Ten Sleep

Access Fund is proud to welcome a new local affiliate organization, the Bighorn Climbers' Coalition (BCC). This nonprofit organization aims to protect climbing resources in the Bighorn Mountains and Bighorn Basin of Wyoming. These resources include Ten Sleep Canyon and the 1,000+ boulder problems and sport climbs situated near Cody Basin. BCC intends to work closely with local communities, the Bureau of Land Management (BLM), and the U.S. Forest Service to address climbing management issues like human waste, trash, camping, signage, parking, trails, and economic impact. For more information, visit <http://bighornclimbers.org>.

Access Fund Welcomes Bishop Area Climbers Coalition

With world-class Sierra scenery and a lifetime of rock climbing, Bishop attracts climbers from around the world. Local climbers have formed a new LCO, Bishop Area Climbers Coalition (BACC) to minimize climber impacts, promote responsible use, and protect access. BACC is already making strides with Adopt a Crag stewardship events, partnership with state and federal land managers, and plans for climber education. Access Fund is proud to welcome BACC to the network of climbing advocacy organizations and looks forward to more positive work in the Bishop area. For more on BACC, go to www.facebook.com/BishopAreaClimbersCoalition.

Ohio Climbers Coalition New Addition to National Network

Access Fund is excited to welcome the new Ohio Climbers Coalition (OCC) to our national network of local climbing organizations. Built on the foundation laid by Northeast Ohio Climbers Coalition, OCC's mission is to promote and protect Ohio climbing for generations to come. Ohio climbers face tough climbing restrictions, despite a growing number of climbers who want access to the state's high-quality crags and boulders. Access Fund's new Ohio regional coordinator, Jack Santo, has helped spearhead the effort behind OCC. Learn more at www.ohioclimberscoalition.org.

HOW LONG WILL IT LAST?

Pack it in, pack it out. This is a familiar mantra to the seasoned outdoor enthusiast. But what happens when we don't pack it out? How long does our trash last?

Before moving on from the base of a climb or resting place, search the area for “micro-garbage,” including cigarette filters, discarded finger tape, and organic litter such as orange peels. Even minute amounts of waste can harm animals and the environment. Be vigilant about packing out your climbing trash, and help spread the word! ■

This information is brought to you in partnership with the Leave No Trace Center for Outdoor Ethics.

SPOTLIGHT ON LOCAL ADVOCACY SAVE SANDSTONE BOULDERING

Access Director Joe Sambataro recently caught up with Jeff Engel of Minnesota Climbers Association (MCA) for our Spotlight on Local Advocacy series. MCA formed over 10 years ago to preserve climbing across the state, and it recently kicked off a campaign to protect one of the finest bouldering areas in Minnesota. Learn more and go online to donate today at www.accessfund.org/sandstone.

JOE: Has climbing always been allowed at Sandstone?

JEFF: Years ago we made an agreement with the owners to allow bouldering. We gave our word we would take care of the property and strive for minimal impact. The landowners don't live close to the property, so keeping contact was difficult. I've sent letters over the years asking if climbing access was still allowed, but in most cases never heard back.

JOE: How did MCA learn that the bouldering area was for sale?

JEFF: Last fall there was an incident where a group of boulderers had a run-in with a bow hunter who claimed he was the only one with access to the land. Alarmed, I sent out letters to both brothers who own the property. Finally I got an email reply from one of them. They were apologetic about the incident. Turns out one brother gave us access, and the other brother gave the hunter access. It was through that encounter that we learned the land was for sale.

JOE: This project is getting some key support from the Parks and Trails Council of Minnesota (PTCM). Tell us a little more about their role?

JEFF: The landowners gave the climbing community the first opportunity to buy their land. We had six months to figure out a way to make a deal. I made contact with the PTCM, whose mission is to buy property in Minnesota and eventually turn it over to the state park system. This was a perfect match. The PTCM accepted our application for assistance and made a purchase agreement with the landowners. MCA is helping to fundraise the holding and closing costs.

JOE: How has it been working with PTCM?

JEFF: It has been great. Not only are they helping us purchase Sandstone, but they are helping us work with the MN Department of Natural Resources and nearby Banning State Park to encourage them to allow climbing and bouldering in their park, where it is currently prohibited.

JOE: It's been only a few months of fundraising, and MCA has raised over $25,000 toward its goal of $30,000. MCA has been really creative in its fundraising efforts. What are some fundraising tips for other local climbing organizations to try out?

JEFF: We've made a fair amount of money with raffling off big prizes like a bouldering package or sport climbing package. This fall we've had a couple of really cool fundraising events, including a festival at Robinson City Park across the river from the bouldering and a celebration at Vertical Endeavors climbing gym. Visit "Save Sandstone" on Facebook to learn about any upcoming events.

JOE: Have any new partners come out of the woodwork to help save Sandstone bouldering?

JEFF: The whole local climbing community has rallied for this cause—individual climbers have donated, and we've received support from The Wisconsin Climbers Association, Organic Bouldering Mats, and Wallopedia to name a few.

JOE: What should climbers keep in mind during their next trip to Sandstone? How can they get involved?

JEFF: Next time you're climbing in Sandstone, remember that at one point it was not allowed. Thank the landowners for letting it happen and for giving climbers the first opportunity to buy the land.

JOE: Any other thoughts that you'd like to share with the climbing advocacy community?

JEFF: Smile lots, make landowners know they are king, and never stop pursuing your goal. Access is a slow process, and you have to be tenacious and dedicated to make it happen. ■

Grant Funding by Category

Game-Changing Grants

Every grant makes an impact. Some change the face of climbing in a region.

Boat Rock, Georgia

In 2002 and 2004, Access Fund granted SCC $13,000 for the acquisition of Boat Rock, Atlanta’s beloved urban bouldering area. Halfway destroyed by real estate development, the remaining granite boulders were in imminent danger. This was SCC’s first land acquisition and a watershed moment for climbing conservation in the Southeast. SCC went on to purchase and protect five more climbing areas in Alabama and Tennessee. Organizations like the Carolina Climbers Coalition and Red River Gorge Climbers Coalition soon followed with two of the largest climbing area purchases ever. Private land acquisition is now one of the most powerful tools for protecting climbing access in the South.

Castle Rocks State Park, Idaho

In 1998, Access Fund awarded $30,000 to purchase climbing resources for Castle Rocks State Park in Idaho. The lands purchased with Access Fund grant money remain open to climbing, yet neighboring BLM land closed in 2010 due to cultural resource concerns. Access Fund firmly believes there is a win-win to protecting cultural resources and allowing limited climbing access, as evidenced by the successful climbing management plan that we helped develop with Castle Rocks State Park.

Indian Creek, Utah

Access Fund has awarded 10 grants at this premier crack climbing destination. The grant funds have assisted trail projects led by Rocky Mountain Field Institute, one of the leading experts in the field, as well as toilet installations, climber education, and the startup of Friends of Indian Creek. These projects have helped protect this sensitive desert landscape and keep it open to climbing for generations to come.

Unaweep, Colorado

Access Fund grants, in conjunction with help from local climbers, have facilitated acquisition of five parcels in Unaweep Canyon since 1991, conserving this unique climbing area and keeping it open to public, passive recreation for generations to come. Unaweep Canyon is an important local resource in the Grand Junction area of Western Colorado. The property gives climbers access to a lineup of long, steep granite climbs in an area that has been troubled by difficult access. ■

SOUTHEASTERN CLIMBERS COALITION
CELEBRATES
20 YEARS

TOP FIVE ACHIEVEMENTS

- 1. INSPIRE. SCC spurred a movement of Southeast land acquisition and protection, beginning with the purchase of Boat Rock in 1998 to save the beloved Atlanta bouldering area from development.
- 2. MANAGE. SCC manages eight climbing areas in Alabama, Georgia, and Tennessee for the benefit and enjoyment of the public.
- 3. VOLUNTEER. They logged over 20,000 volunteer stewardship hours maintaining trails, stewarding climbing areas, and making the Southeast a more beautiful place to live, play, and climb.
- 4. PROTECT. The group plays a critical role in protecting access to public lands, including Sunset, Foster Falls, T-Wall, Sand Rock, and more. Many climbing areas on public land would otherwise be closed if not for SCC action.
- 5. EQUIP. They distributed thousands of fixed anchors to local equippers to make existing routes safer.

Twenty years ago, the National Park Service was set to close Sunset Rock, the crown jewel of Southern Sandstone, which hosts a fantastic collection of trad climbs on a ridge high above Chattanooga, Tennessee.

A group of concerned local climbers banded together under the name Southeastern Climbers Coalition, intent on working with the Park Service to save access to Sunset Rock. And that is exactly what they did.

Twenty years later, the Southeastern Climbers Coalition is one of the strongest local climbing organizations in the nation, with over 500 members, thousands of volunteers, and a track record of preserving climbing access at dozens of word-class climbing areas across the Southeast.

“We are getting more effective every year, and finding new, creative ways to partner with other groups that support our mission,” explains Matthew Gant, SCC president. “We’ve successfully protected climbing for 20 years, and I fully expect to see even greater things from SCC in the years to come.”

The SCC owns six crags across Georgia, Tennessee, and Alabama—including Boat Rock, Kings Bluff, Jamestown, Yellow Bluff, Steele, and Hospital Boulders—and leases Castle Rock in Tennessee.

But they’ve done more than just buy land. “Protecting a crag from closure is only half the battle,” says Access Fund Southeast Regional Director Zachary Lesch-Huie. “The SCC has been equally strong on the stewardship front, leveraging thousands of volunteers to build and maintain trails, educate younger climbers, maintain fixed anchors, and sustain the climbing areas in the Deep South.”

SCC’s 20th anniversary celebrates two rock-solid decades of protecting climbing access in the Southeast, and the Access Fund is proud to call them partners. ■

Chris is a writer, photographer, public speaker, and social activist whose work focuses on reconnecting people with nature and aiding the transition to a more mindful and sustainable world. He’s a veteran of over 30 expeditions to the most remote corners of the globe, including Everest, McKinley, Pumori, Ama Dablam, the jungles of Borneo, the Arctic, and remote regions of Bhutan and Burma.

Chris’s current project, Women Who Dare: North America’s Most Inspiring Women Climbers, was published this month by Globe Pequot/Falcon Press. It is a celebration of feminine athleticism, wisdom, and skill. It profiles 20 of America’s most inspiring women climbers, ranging from legends like Lynn Hill to the rising stars of today. The book is illustrated with 124 of Chris’s full-color photographs of the profiled climbers in action, including the four shown here in the Vertical Times (cover, page 3, and page 15).
